Divorce and Your Credit

Protecting Your Finances When Ending a Marriage

If you are considering a divorce, going through a divorce, or are newly divorced or legally separated, you must pay careful attention to your credit. Why?

Let's say that pursuant to your divorce decree, your spouse is required to pay off two jointly held credit cards. A few months later, he or she neglects to make payments as required, and your creditors contact you demanding payment.

You advise them that according to your divorce decree, your ex is responsible for the debt. Not so, your creditors reply. Since they were not parties to the decree, you are still legally responsible for paying off the joint accounts. Although you can proceed against your ex for violating the decree, your creditors still have the right to report the late payments to the credit bureaus. Those negative marks now become part of your credit history.

Getting a divorce gives you a chance to start over, and starting over is much easier when you already have your financial life in order. This booklet explains what divorce can do to your credit and how to plan for post-split financial success.

Quick Tips About Divorce and Your Credit

While the end of a marriage is often heartbreaking, the financial consequences can be even more distressing and can last longer. Three out of four divorcees remarry within three years, but it often takes much longer to dig yourself out of divorce-induced debt, much less rebuild a credit rating.

- If you plan to divorce, pay special attention to joint credit accounts, such as your mortgage, home equity loans, and credit cards.
 - Ask creditors to close joint accounts. If you assume responsibility for an account during the divorce proceedings, you will need to reopen the accounts under your name only.
 - Joint credit accounts are the responsibility of both spouses, even if a divorce decree asserts that one spouse is responsible for paying off the joint account. Creditors are not a party to divorce agreements, so it is your responsibility to see that your spouse fulfills his or her obligations under the decree.
 - Your credit will suffer if your joint accounts are not paid on time every month. If, for example, your ex makes charges on a jointly held credit card and then refuses to pay the balance, it will show up on your credit report and may prevent you from getting additional credit or loans.

What to do if you are going through a divorce

First, open checking and savings accounts in your own name — and don't tell your spouse.

Frequently, when couples are contemplating divorce, one spouse will write bad checks or somehow abuse the joint bank account, leading to credit problems for the innocent spouse. By opening your own accounts — and keeping them quiet — you can help avoid credit problems in the future.

Open your individual accounts quickly, and fund them with as much money as you can stash away. According to the U.S. Department of Labor, a woman's standard of living drops 45% in the first year after her divorce, while the average man's jumps 15%. Pay close attention to your budget, and make sure you don't get in over your head with debt.

Frequently, one spouse is responsible for maintaining a couple's bank accounts and paying bills, while the other spouse may be in the dark. Make yourself aware of what's going on as soon as you can. It's no surprise that the spouse who knows the least about joint assets is at the greatest risk financially.

To avoid being taken advantage of, try to collect as much information as you can before divorce is even discussed. Make copies of bank account records, credit card statements, and tax returns.

In particular, make sure you have balances, transaction statements, contact names, addresses, and phone numbers for the following:

- Joint bank accounts
- Brokerage statements
- Business interests
- Social Security
- Credit cards
- Tax returns
- Pension funds
- Loans
- Medical coverage
- Wills and trusts
- Mortgage
- Inheritances
- Insurance (home, auto, life)
- Marital assets (artwork, antiques)
- Safe deposit boxes

To protect yourself, store copies of relevant documents in a safe place — a secret safe deposit box, at a friend's house, or at your attorney's office. For additional privacy, consider opening a post office box or having personal mail directed to a friend's address.

If you have joint credit accounts while you are separated or in the middle of divorce proceedings, ensure that regular payments are being made. That way, your credit won't suffer. It's important to remember that as long as there is an outstanding balance on any joint account, both you and your spouse are liable for it.

You should also ask creditors to close any joint accounts or accounts on which your ex was an authorized user. As an alternative, you can request that the creditor convert the joint account to an individual one and have the debt transferred to the spouse who is responsible for paying it.

Individual vs. Joint Accounts

There are two different types of credit accounts, individual and joint. When you apply for credit — whether it's a credit card, bank loan, or mortgage — you'll be asked if you want to open an individual or joint account. (Even if you establish an individual account, you can authorize another person to use it.)

Individual Accounts

When you apply for an individual account, the lender will consider only your income, assets, and credit history. If you are approved for an individual account, you and only you are responsible for paying off the debt — even if you are married. The account will appear on the credit report and may appear on the credit report of any authorized user.

For tax purposes, income in community property states is considered to belong equally to both spouses, regardless of which spouse actually earned the income. If you live in a community property state, both spouses may be liable for the debts of one spouse, and debts may appear on each spouse's credit report. Be sure to check the regulations for each individual state for any differences. Currently, the following states are community property states: Arizona, California, Idaho, Louisiana, Nevada, New Mexico, Texas, Washington, and Wisconsin.

For spouses who earn little or no income, it may be difficult to obtain credit or be approved for a loan without the other spouse co-signing the application. If you are able to open an account, however, make sure you establish a strong credit history by making all the payments on time.

Joint Accounts

When you apply for a joint account, the lender will consider the income, assets, and credit history of both spouses.

Even if only one spouse handles the money and pays the bills, both spouses are responsible for ensuring that a joint debt gets paid. Any lender who reports on the credit history of an account held jointly must report it in both names if the account was opened after June 1, 1977. A joint credit application combines the financial resources of two or more people and may make a potential creditor feel more secure and therefore more likely to approve the loan or credit card. Be aware, however, that each person who applied for the joint account is legally responsible to pay the creditor for the entire amount of the debt. This is true even if a divorce decree states that one spouse is responsible for paying a debt. A former spouse can adversely affect the other spouse's credit history on a jointly held account by paying late, exceeding the credit limit, or paying less than the minimum amount due.

By law, creditors cannot automatically close a joint account due to a change in marital status, but they can do so at the request of either spouse. Creditors don't have to agree, however, to convert joint accounts to individual ones. Instead, a creditor may require you to reapply for credit on an individual basis and then decide — based on your new application — to either extend or deny you credit. Similarly, when a divorcing couple has a mortgage or home equity loan, the lender will probably require you to refinance the loan to remove one spouse from the obligation.

Authorized Users

If you open an account, individual or joint, you can authorize another person to use the account. Many times, people will authorize a relative to use the account. That's fine but remember that you remain responsible to the creditor for paying the entire balance. If you authorize your spouse, or someone else, to use your individual account, a creditor reporting on the payment history to the credit bureaus may report the account in the authorized user's name as well as yours. You, however, are the only one liable for paying the debt, not the authorized user. These accounts are usually opened for convenience. They are helpful to people who might not qualify for credit on their own, like students.

If you are having trouble getting credit after your divorce, you may want to see if a family member with excellent credit will allow you to become an authorized user on one of their accounts. This will allow you to credit and build credit history. Just make sure to have a clear agreement with the relative on how charges can be made and how the bill gets paid.

Getting the Credit You Deserve

After going through a divorce, it is essential to establish your own credit if you have not in the past. Here are some tips for building your own credit history:

- Establish a steady work record.
- Pay all bills promptly.
- Open a checking account and don't bounce checks.
- Open a savings account and make regular deposits.
- Apply for a local store credit card and make regular monthly payments.
- Apply for a small loan using your savings account as collateral or apply for a credit builder loan.
- Get a co-signer on a loan and pay back the loan as agreed.
- When you are getting a new credit card, shop around for the best terms. Check out www.BankRate.com for the best credit card deals.
- Read — and understand — your credit card contract, and don't rush into signing anything.
- Make copies of all signed contracts.
- Make the largest payments possible on your credit cards.
- Be aware of the penalties for missed payments.

Getting on the Road to Freedom

Budgets are always necessary to achieve financial freedom, but now more than ever you must seriously consider how you are going to spend your money. People who can account for their money are people who are in control of their finances.

When you get a divorce, you need to have an individual budget planned out. This will give you peace of mind and make the transition easier.

Building a New Budget

Use this worksheet to help figure out your post-divorce budget. Compare what you actually spent in a month to the amount you budgeted. This will give you a clear picture of how realistic the amounts you budgeted are for each item and will allow you to be more accurate when doing your next monthly budget.
